society. By abolishing the divine right of monarchy, drafting a constitution, and establishing a parliament, it accelerated the growth of the liberal-democratic state. By eliminating serfdom and the sale of government offices and by reforming the tax system, it fostered a rational approach to administration. In the nineteenth century, the ideals and reforms of the French Revolution spread in shock waves across Europe, in country after country, the old order was challenged by the ideals of liberty and equality.

1 Abuses of the Old Regime

The roots of the French Revolution lay in the aristocratic structure of French society. The Third Estate came to resent the special privileges of the aristocracy, a legacy of the Middle Ages, and the inefficient and corrupt methods of government. To many French people influenced by the ideas of the philosophes, French society seemed an affront to reason. By 1789, reformers sought a new social order based on rationality and equality.

GRIEVANCES OF THE THIRD ESTATE

At the same time that elections were held for the Estates General, the three estates drafted cahiers de doléances, the lists of grievances that deputies would take with them when the Estates General convened. The cahiers from all three estates expressed loyalty to the monarchy and the church and called for a written constitution and an elected assembly. The cahiers of the clergy and the nobility insisted on the preservation of traditional rights and privileges. The Cahier of the Third Estate of Dourdan, in the généralité of Orléans (one of the thirty-four administrative units into which prerevolutionary France was divided), expressed the reformist hopes of the Third Estate. Some of the grievances in the cahier follow.

29 March, 1789

The order of the third estate of the City, Bailiages [judicial districts], and County of Dourdan, imbued with gratitude prompted by the paternal kindness of the King, who deigns to restore its former rights and its former constitution, forgets at this moment its misfortunes and impotence, to bark only to its foremost sentiment and its foremost duty, that of sacrificing everything to the glory of the Patrie [nation] and the service of His Majesty. It supplicates him to accept the grievances, complaints, and remonstrances which it is permitted to bring to the foot of the throne, and to see therein only the expression of its zeal and the homage of its obedience.

It wishes:

1. That his subjects of the third estate, equal by such status to all other citizens, present themselves before the common father without other distinction which might degrade them.
2. That all the orders [the three estates], already united by duty and a common desire to contribute equally to the needs of the State, also deliberate in common concerning its needs.
3. That no citizen lose his liberty except according to law; that, consequently, no one be arrested by virtue of special orders, or, in imperative circumstances necessitate such orders, that the prisoners be handed over to the regular courts of justice within forty-eight hours at the latest.
4. That no letters or writings intercepted in the post [mails] be the cause of the detention of any citizen, or be produced in court against him, except in case of conspiracy or undertaking against the State.
5. That the property of all citizens be inviolable, and that no one be required to make sacrifice thereof for the public welfare, except upon assurance of indemnification based upon the statement of freely selected appraisers.
6. That the property of all citizens be inviolable, and that no one be required to make sacrifice thereof for the public welfare, except upon assurance of indemnification based upon the statement of freely selected appraisers.
7. That every personal tax be abolished; that thus the capitation and the taille and its accessories be merged with the singuliers, in a tax on land and real or nominal property.
8. That such tax be borne equally, without distinction, by all classes of citizens and by all kinds of property, even feudal and contingent rights.
9. That the tax substituited for the convôtes [taxes paid in labor, often road building] be borne by all classes of citizens equally and without distinction. That said tax, at present beyond the capacity of those who pay it and the needs to which it is destined, be reduced by at least one-half.

A taille was a tax levied on the value of a peasant's land or wealth. A capitation was a head or poll tax paid for each person. A singulier was a tax on income and was paid chiefly by peasants.
FINANCES

1. That if the Estates General considers it necessary to preserve the fees of alms (tax on commodities), such fees be made uniform throughout the entire kingdom and reduced to a single denomination.

2. That the tax of the gabelle (tax on salt) be eliminated if possible, or that it be regulated among the several provinces of the kingdom.

3. That the taxes on hides, which have totally destroyed that branch of commerce and caused it to go abroad, be suppressed forever.

4. That all useless offices, either in police or in the administration of justice, be abolished and suppressed.

AGRICULTURE

4. That the right to hunt may never affect the property of the citizen; that, accordingly, he may at all times travel over his lands, have injurious herbs uprooted, and cut leasers (alfalfa), vins de printemps (velvet), and other produce whenever it suits him; and that stubble may be freely raked immediately after the harvest.

11. That individuals as well as communities be permitted to free themselves from the restraints of law and order (people were required to use the lord's mill, winepress, and oven), and costs of payments in money or in kind, at a rate likewise established by His Majesty on the basis of the deliberations of the Estates General.

15. That the militia, which devastates the country, takes workers away from husbandry, produces premature and ill-married marriages, and imposes secret and arbitrary taxes upon those who are subject thereto, be suppressed and replaced by voluntary enlistment at the expense of the provinces.

Emmanuel Sieyès
Bourgeois Disdain for Special Privileges of the Aristocracy

In a series of pamphlets, including The Essay on Privileges (1788) and What Is the Third Estate? (1789), Abbé Emmanuel Sieyès (1748–1836) expressed the bourgeoisie’s disdain for the nobility. Although educated at Jesuit schools to become a priest, Sieyès had come under the influence of Enlightenment ideas. In What Is the Third Estate? he denounced the special privileges of the nobility, asserted that the people are the source of political authority, and maintained that national unity stands above estate or local interests. The ideals of the Revolution—liberty, equality, and fraternity—are found in Sieyès’s pamphlet, excerpts of which follow.

The plan of this book is fairly simple. We must ask ourselves three questions.

1. What is the Third Estate? Everything.

2. What has it been until now in the political order? Nothing.

3. What does it want to be? Something.

... Only the well-paid and honorific posts are filled by members of the privileged order (nobiles). Are we to give them credit for this? We could do so only if the Third Estate was unable or unwilling to fill these posts. We know the answer. Nevertheless, the privileged have dared to preclude the Third Estate. "No matter how useful you are," they said, "no matter how able you are, you can go so far and no further. Honors are not for the like of you."

... Has nobody observed that as soon as the government becomes the property of a separate class, it starts to grow out of all proportion and that posts are created nor to meet the needs of the governed but of those who govern them?

It suffices to have made the point that the so-called usefulness of a privileged order to the public service is a fable; that, without help from this order, all the arduous tasks in the service are performed by the Third Estate; that without this order the higher posts could be infinitely better filled; that they ought to be the natural prize and reward of recognized ability and service; and that if the privileged have succeeded in usurping all well-paid and honorific posts, this is both a hateful iniquity towards the generality of citizens and an act of treason to the commonwealth.

Who is bold enough to maintain that the Third Estate does not contain within itself everything needful to constitute a complete nation? It is like a strong and robust man with one arm still in chains. If the privileged order were removed, the nation would not be something less but something more. ... but then is the Third Estate? All; but an "all" that is fettered and oppressed. What would it be without the privileged order? It would be all; but free and flourishing. Nothing will go well without the Third Estate; everything would go considerably better without the two others...

... The privileged, far from being useful to the nation, can only weaken and injure it; ... the nobility may be a burden for the nation.

The nobility, however, is ... a foreigner in our midst because of its civil and political prerogatives.

What is a nation? A body of associates living under common laws and represented by the same legislative assembly, etc.

Is it not obvious that the nobility possesses privileges and exemptions which it blatantly calls its rights and which stand distinct from the rights of the great body of citizens? Because of these special rights, the nobility does not belong to the common order, nor is it subjected to the common laws. Thus its private rights make it a people apart in the great nation.

2. The Role of the Philosophes

The Enlightenment thinkers were not themselves revolutionaries. However, by substituting the institutions and values of the Old Regime to critical scrutiny and by offering the hope that society could be reformed, the philosophers created the intellectual precondition for revolution.
